FOREWORD

Where we live affects each one of us, whether we are in the noise and bright lights of the city; in the slower pace of the country town or village, or in the isolation often associated with the high rise flat or the lonely rural cottage.

In the context of affecting all who live here, Turvey is no exception - even though we may have been born here; we may have come with our husband or wife; we may have chosen to live here on moving from another area, or we may have decided to retire here. No matter for what reason, the long history and the care which has been lavished on the village, particularly since the 1780s, infuses us all causing us to take pride in its past, to care for it now and to fiercely guard its future.

It was with pleasure, therefore, that the Parish Council learned in the Autumn of 1980 that a small group wished to take an initiative by placing on record those things in the village about which we care, both now and for the future, and I have been very impressed by the way in which over 71% of those living in the village responded and contributed their views by completing a comprehensive questionnaire.

The Turvey Parish Council is grateful to the Turvey Appraisal Committee for this important voluntary work which it supports and which will be used as a guide for the future.

Chairman, Turvey Parish Council

INTRODUCTION

What follows is not intended to be a detailed history, biography or inventory of Turvey - there are many publications and records available from which such detail can be found. It is intended to supply a short and objective statement about the village of Turvey, as well as something about the people who live here, what we like about our village and what causes us concern. Inevitably in the 1980s and beyond, there will be changes, not necessarily of our own making as Government, (both national and local), public authorities and private developers produce new policies and plans. Consequently this record, to which everyone in the village has had an opportunity to contribute, is intended to influence and to be taken into account when new plans are being devised for, and implemented in Turvey.
